

ALTERMODERN

Altermodern was the first in a series of four one-day events, the Prologues, preceding the Tate Triennial exhibition. With contributions from prominent writers, art historians, artists and philosophers, each Prologue comprised lectures, performances, films and discussions attempting to introduce and provoke debate around the Triennial's themes.

The first Prologue opened the debate with the proposition that the period defined by postmodernism has come to an end and what can be called 'altermodernity' has taken its place. Art made in the times we live in belongs to the global era, and is conceived and produced as a reaction against standardisation and nationalism. The art is characterised by artists' cross-border, cross-cultural negotiations; a new real and virtual mobility; the surfing of different disciplines; the use of fiction as an expression of autonomy.

SATURDAY 28 APRIL 2008
TATE BRITAIN

14:00
MILLBANK ENTRANCE
NAVIN
RAWANCHAIKUL
Navins of Bollywood

14:00 and 15.15
AUDITORIUM
STÉPHANE GOXE
and JORDI VIDAL
Servitude and Simulacra

16:00
GALLERY 62
TRIS VONNA-MICHELL
Auto Tracking:
From Cellar to Garret

16:30
AUDITORIUM
OKWUI ENWEZOR
chaired by
J.J. CHARLESWORTH
Specious Modernity:
Speculations on the End of Postcolonial Utopia

MODERNITY AND POSTCOLONIAL AMBIVALENCE

Okwui ENWEZOR

FROM GRAND MODERNITY TO PETIT MODERNITY

THERE IS A DUAL NARRATIVE that is often taken to be characteristic of modernity: the first is the idea of its unique Europeanness, and the second is its translatability into non-European cultures. This narrative argues for the mutability of modernity, thus permitting its export and enhancing its universal character while putting a European epistemological stamp on its subsequent reception. The travelling character of this dimension of modernity as export understands modernity as emerging from Europe, say from the mid-fifteenth century, and slowly spreading outward like a million points of light into the patches of darkness that lie outside its foundational centre. Modernity in this guise was projected as an instrument of progress. The guiding concepts often associated with it – instrumental rationality, the development of capitalism – emerged in the debate between theological and scientific reason, and provided the foundation for the period of European Renaissance and Enlightenment, in which two structures of power and domination that marked the Middle Ages – feudalism and theological absolutism – collapsed. Scientific rationality and individual property that formed the basis of capital accumulation were triumphant. This collapse shifted the scales of sovereign power from the theological to the secular.

The chief principles of secularism – individual liberty, political sovereignty, democratic forms of governance, capitalism, etc. – defined its universal character and furnished its master narrative. Thus emerged the rightness of the European model, not only for its diverse societies, but also for other societies and civilisations across the rest of the world. Most importantly, the export of European modernity became not only a justification for, but a principal part of global imperialism. Among serious critics, the master narrative made the claims of universality susceptible to epistemological and historical distortion when deployed in the service of European imperialism. There is good reason for the criticism. Some historians on the right, such as Niall Ferguson, have argued that modern European imperialism, specifically that of the British Empire, was actually a good thing, not to be regretted, as it bestowed a semblance of modernity on those privileged enough to have been recipients of the Empire's civilising zeal.¹ So on the one hand there is grand modernity in all its European manifestations in reason and progress, and on the other is what could be called petit modernity, which represents the export kind, a sort of quotation, which some would go so far as to designate a mimic modernity through its various European references.

It is this relation between grand and petit modernity that has contributed to the widespread search for facilities of modernity that represent what the Indian Marxist historian Dipesh Chakrabarty would call modernity's heterotemporal history.² Chakrabarty argues that the various scenes of modernity observed from the point of view of a heterotemporal composition of history reveals the extent to which experiences of modernity are shot through with the particularities of each given locale, therefore deregulating any idea of one dominant universalism of historical experience. Such experiences, he argues, are structured within specific epistemological conditions that take account of diverse modes of social identity and discourse. Throughout the twentieth century, all across the world, diverse cultural contexts made adapting or translating modernity into specific local variants a pathway towards modernisation, by acquiring the accoutrements of a modern society. Because of colonial experience this resulted in what could be referred to as grand modernity writ small in cultures – Chakrabarty's case study was India – perceived to be in historical transition from colonialism to post-colonialism. In comparing different types of modernity, and in our attempts to describe their different characteristics we are constantly confronted with the persistent tension between grand modernity and petit modernity. How can this tension be resolved? And how can the fundamental historical experiences and the particularities of locale that attend them be reconciled or even compared? It strikes me that all recent attempts to make sense of modernity and bend it toward the multiple situated petit modernities – again Chakrabarty would have called these 'provincialities' – are premised on finding a way to render the divergent experiences and uses of modernity, namely the necessity to historicise and ground them in traditions of thought and practice.

FORMS OF TRANSFORMATION: MODERNITY AS META-LANGUAGE

TO HISTORICISE MODERNITY is not only to ground it within the conditions of social, political and economic life, it is also to recognise it as a meta-language with which cultural systems become codified and gain modern legitimisation.

The idea of modernity as a meta-language has been particularly acute for me over the past year. To travel in China and South Korea recently is to encounter this meta-language in action and in many guises. All around cities like Seoul, Busan, Shanghai, Beijing, Chengdu, Hangzhou, Guangzhou, Hong Kong and Taipei, etc., the clatter of machinery erecting impressive infrastructures sounded like the drill of the Morse code typing out the meta-language of modernisation. These structures – from museums, opera houses and theatres to stadiums, sporting centres, high-speed train lines, airports, stock exchanges, shopping malls and luxury apartments – bring alive to our very eyes brand new urban conditions and cultural spheres that were not remotely imaginable a generation ago. The cities of East Asia have become the playground of global architects enjoying the patronage of both public and private developers.

In fact, over the course of the last sixteen months,³ I have had occasion to travel repeatedly to South Korea and China. On numerous trips, as part of my research work as a curator, this situation of urban transformation and social renewal was visible everywhere. Underscoring the experiences of these trips is an observation of the scale of growth of the contemporary art world: artists, galleries, collectors, exhibition spaces, museums and art fairs all are making their way to Beijing and Shanghai. In China alone, the restless imagination and ambition shaping the landscape of contemporary art is breathtaking. Along with this shift, especially among intellectuals and artists, a reverse phenomenon of migration is occurring, namely the relocation back to an Asian context from which many of them had emigrated years before. Yet it is not only the infrastructures of the state and private speculation that are being revived, but the artistic and intellectual cultures of many cities are also being remapped. New centres are definitely emerging, but rather than cultural and intellectual capital being concentrated in a limited number of cities, it is being dispersed in many cities as the reverse migration of ideas continues to explode and expand the cultural parameters of new China and South Korea.

OKWUI ENWEZOR [BELOW] responding to NICOLAS BOURRIAUD'S [TOP] definition of the new 'modern': 'altermodern'. The session was chaired by London-based writer, curator and artist J.J. CHARLESWORTH.

THE BAZAAR OR WORLD'S FAIR OF MODERNISATION

I HAVE WITNESSED and marvelled at the breathtaking speed and scale of the modernisation occurring in both countries. Of course, the economies of these two countries – along with their modernisation, both in depth and in breadth – pale in comparison to Japan's, the immediate East Asian reference that lies equidistant to its two newly modernising neighbours. Both China and South Korea's financial strengths derive from a massive export economy. China, of course, is known as the factory of the world, a designation made possible by the fact that its factories are disproportionately the production centres of cheap global consumer goods that have transformed the 'Made in China' brand into a ubiquitous logo of global commerce. South Korea's industrial power, on the other hand, is characterised by a focus on advanced technology and heavy industry. Each of these two countries has built up its infrastructure through the combination of grand and petit modernity, bringing together successful models from both East and West. That is, they are both undergoing modernisation based on the acquisition of instruments and institutions of Western modernity – I mean this in a superficial sense – within a relatively short span of time, yet without the wholesale discarding of local values that modify the importations.

The ongoing, large-scale process of modernisation in China and South Korea underscores part of the energy, excitement and sense of newness coursing through the various strata of each country, making them contemporary emblems of a new modernity. Travelling in Europe, on the other hand, conveys no such sense of energy, excitement or newness. Europe, on the contrary, feels old and dour in its majestic petrification. In fact, many European cities feel less like part of our time. With their miles of imperious ceremonial architecture and in the quaintness of the narrow, tourist-friendly, cobble-stoned streets, walking through these cities feels like being in a museum of modernity. The museumification of Europe is in fact the intention: the display of heritage, historical glory and dead past. Preservationists of this heritage and glory play the role of morticians of modernity.

Yet ancient cities like Beijing and Hangzhou – in a country that possesses a very old civilisation and society – in contrast feel nothing like museums. Where vestiges of the past exist, they tend to be peripheral rather than central to modern Chinese cities. These cities, if anything, could be likened to temporary exhibitions of city-making, a succession of dizzying obsolescence; a bazaar or world's fair of modernisation. The cities' skylines are full of glass boxes crowned with the pitched green roofs of the classical Chinese pagoda. This hybridisation may appear absurd to us now, until we remember that, not too long ago, post-modern architecture in the West was busily inventing these trumped-up styles of the classical and the modern based on a similarly invented autochthonous Western past. Like latter-day biennales, Chinese cities are theatres of the grand statement, a lot of which have no other purpose than to impress and inspire awe. This has been achieved by what some have argued as indiscriminate modernisation and urbanisation schemes that have erased much of the cultural heritage of old China, sweeping out and destroying many old neighbourhoods and putting in their place unremarkable architecture.⁴ Chinese bureaucrats, urban planners and developers, like latter-day Baron Hausmanns, are simply unsympathetic to any idea that cities like Beijing need to be historicised, that is to say museumified. Modernity is a continuous project. Its principal features, they may reason, are at best contingent. By this conjecture, I want to seek out what is currently at play in the relations of discourse in which the particularities or provincialities – I take this to mean the conditions and situations that generate them – of modernity are situated through the practice, production, dissemination and reception of contemporary art, far from any claims to a grand heritage or an arriviste, mimic petit translation.

THE ALTERMODERN AND HABITATIONS OF CONTEMPORARY ART

IF THE CURRENT SPATE of modernisation in China effectively lays waste to heritage and historical glory and instead emphasises contingency, might it not be reasonable to argue for the non-universal nature of modernity as such? This certainly would be true when applied to contemporary art. We are constantly entertained and exercised in equal measure by the notion that there is no red line running from modernism to contemporary art. For the pedagogues of the existence of such lineage, the chief emblem of this unbroken narrative can be found in the attention given to the procedures and ideas of the Western historical avant-gardes by contemporary artists. On the other hand, I take the view of this claim, pace Chakrabarty, as a provincial account of the complexity of contemporary art. To understand its various vectors, we need then to provincialise modernism. There is no one lineage of modernism or, for that matter, of contemporary art. Looking for an equivalent of an Andy Warhol in Mao's China is to be seriously blind to the fact that China of the Pop art era had neither a consumer society nor a capitalist structure, two things that were instrumentalised in Warhol's critique and usage of its images. In that sense, Pop art would be anathema to the revolutionary program – and, one might even claim, to the avant-garde imagination – of such a period in China that coincides with the condition and situation that fostered Warhol's analytical excavation of American mass media and consumer culture. But the absence of Pop art in China in the 1960s is not the same as the absence of 'progressive' contemporary Chinese art during that period, even if such contemporary art may have been subdued by the aggressive destruction of the Cultural Revolution.

IN HIS LECTURE AND SUBSEQUENT ESSAY, ENWEZOR drew on works such as THOMAS HIRSCHORN's Bataille Monument 2002 [TOP] and [BELOW] GUY TILLIM's Congo Series (this work showing supporters of Jean-Pierre Bemba on their way to a rally in Kinshasa, July 2006).

If we are to make sense of contemporary art during this period in China and the United States, then we have to wield the heterotemporal tools of history-writing; in so doing, we will see how differently situated American and Chinese artists were at this time. Despite the importance of globalisation in mediating the recent accounts of contemporary art – a world in which artists like Huang Yong Ping, Zhang Huan, Xu Bing, Matthew Barney, Andreas Gursky and Jeff Koons, for instance, are contemporaries – we can apply the same mode of argument against any uniform or unifocal view of artistic practice today. When Huang Yong Ping, in the work A History of Chinese Painting and a Concise History of Modern Painting washed in a Washing Machine for Two Minutes 1987 (Walker Art Centre, Minneapolis: below centre), washed two art historical texts – the first by Wang Bomin and the latter, one of the first books of Western art history published in China, Herbert Read's A Concise History of Modern Painting – in a washing machine, the result is a mound of pulped ideology, a history of hybridisation rather than universalism.⁵ If we apply the same lens, say, to the work of Yinka Shonibare, a Nigerian artist working in London, we will again see how he has made the tension between histories, narratives, and the mythologies of modernity, identity and subjectivity important ingredients in his continuous attempts to deconstruct the invention of an African tradition by imperialism. The locus of Shonibare's theatrical and sometimes treacherous installations is the fiction of the African fabric he employs. These fabrics and their busy patterns and vivid colours are often taken to be an authentic symbol of an African past. But they are in fact, products of colonial economic transactions that moved from Indonesia to the factories of England and Netherlands, to the markets of West, East and Central Africa, and ultimately to Brixton. These artists inhabit what could be called the provincialities of modernity and have incisively traced diverse paths of modernity through them. By examining these different locales of practice, as well as the historical experiences that inform them, we learn a lot more about the contingent conditions of modernity than about its universalism. Here again, Chakrabarty offers a useful framework in this regard by dint of what he refers to as 'habitations of modernity'.⁶

What could these habitations of modernity be? On what maps do they appear? And in what forms and shapes? The search for the habitations of modernity seems to me the crux of the 'altermodern', the subject of the 2009 Tate Triennial exhibition and the accompanying discursive projects organised by Nicolas Bourriaud, its curator. In his outline to the altermodern project, Bourriaud lays out an intellectual and cultural itinerary, a jagged map of simultaneity and discontinuity; overlapping narratives and contiguous sites of production that form the basis of contemporary art practice globally. The chief claim of the altermodern project is simple: to discover the current habitations of contemporary practice. Thus the altermodern proposes the rejection of rigid structures put in place by a stubborn and implacable modernity and the modernist ideal of artistic autonomy. In the same way, it manifests a rebellion against the systematisation of artistic production based on a singular, universalised conception of artistic paradigms. If there is anything that marks the path of the altermodern, it would be the provincialities of contemporary art practice today – that is, the degree to which these practices, however globalised they may appear, are also informed by specific epistemological models and aesthetic conditions. Within this scheme, Bourriaud sets out to examine for us the unfolding of the diverse fields of contemporary art practice that have been unsettled by global links. But, more importantly, these practices are measured against the totalising principles of grand modernity.

At the core of the altermodern's jagged map is its description of what its author refers to in his introductory paper as the 'offshore' location of contemporary art practice.⁷ However, I will foreground the location of these contemporary practices as indicative of a drive toward an off-centre principle, namely the multifocal, multilocal, heterotemporal and dispersed structures around which contemporary art is often organised and convened. This multiply located off-centre – which might not be analogous to Bourriaud's notion of offshore-based production – is not the same as the logic of de-centred locations. Rather, the off-centre is structured by the simultaneous existence of multiple centres. In this way, rather than being the de-centring of the universal, or the relocation of the centre of contemporary art, as the notion of the offshore suggests, it becomes instead, the emergence of multiplicity, the breakdown of cultural or locational hierarchies, the absence of a singular locus or a limited number of centres.

TOWARD THE EXCENTRIC: POSTCOLONIALITY, POSTMODERNITY AND THE ALTERMODERN

TO A LARGE EXTENT, the discursive feature of the altermodern project seems to me a return to earlier debates that shaped postcolonial and postmodernist critiques of modernity and the aesthetic principle of the universal. At the same time, they launched an attack on modernism's focus on a unifocal rather than dialogic modernity. Embracing these critiques,

Bourriaud's project sets out to explore the excentric⁸ and dialogic nature of art today, including its scattered trajectories and multiple temporalities, by questioning and provincialising the idea of the centre, by de-centring its imaginary, as Chakrabarty posits in his provocative book Provincializing Europe.⁹ Yet this excentric dimension of modern and contemporary art is not necessarily a rejection of modernity and modernism; rather it articulates the shift to off-centre structures of production and dissemination; the dispersal of

TRIS VONNA-MICHELL uses the tradition of storytelling to make energetic performances that take the audience on a mental and physical journey. His narratives, both fictional and non-fictional, explore the ways history is passed on. Auto-Tracking: From Cellar to Garret was a new performance piece, conducted in six acts (each lasting approx. 7 mins). It reworked previous narratives exploring notions of personal and historical spaces and monuments, which are embodied, fabricated or sought for. The spoken-word monologue interwove past and current verbal scripts, performed between interludes of audio field-recordings.

the universal, the refusal of the monolithic, a rebellion against monoculturalism. In this way, what the altermodern proposes is a rephrasing of prior arguments. The objective is to propose a new terminology, one that could succinctly capture both the emergence of multiple cultural fields as they overspill into diverse arenas of thinking and practice, and a reconceptualisation of the structures of legitimation that follow in their wake. In his text, Bourriaud makes concrete what he sees as the field of the altermodern, describing his model as an attempt to redefine modernity in the era of globalisation. A state of mind more than a 'movement', the altermodern goes against cultural standardisation and massification on one hand, against nationalisms and cultural relativism on the other, by positioning itself within the world cultural gaps, putting translation, wandering and culture-crossings at the centre of art production. Offshore-based, it forms clusters and archipelagos of thought against the continental 'mainstream': the altermodern artist produces links between signs far away from each other, explores the past and the present to create original paths.

Envisioning time as a multiplicity rather than as a linear progress, the altermodern artist considers the past as a territory to explore, and navigates throughout history as well as all the planetary time zones. Altermodern is heterochronical. Formally speaking, altermodern art privileges processes and dynamic forms to unidimensional single objects, trajectories to static masses.¹⁰

THE OFFSHORE, OFF-CENTRE AND PROCEDURES OF RELATION

THE FORMULATION of the altermodern reflects precisely Eduoard Glissant's theory of the 'poetics of relation,'¹¹ an idea predicated on linkages and networks of relations rather than on a singular focal point of practice. Bourriaud's idea of the altermodern addresses the cultural geography of relations of discourse and practice. He rightly reads contemporary art as that which always exceeds the borders of spatial confinement, beyond the limited geography of the nation and its totalised identity. The altermodern is structured around trajectories, connections, time zones: heterochronical pathways. Such relations suggest that the project is strongly in accord with a large corpus of scholarship and literature that has made conceiving an alternate system for evaluating modernity, one in which the off-centre contexts of contemporary art are a core intellectual principle. But have not the practices of art always been predicated on trajectories and detours, on dynamic forms and modes of production and dissemination? Is the role of contemporary art not always the constant refusal of orthodoxy; to display attentive vigilance against closure; to challenge all doctrinaire, unitary discourses on which some of the most powerful theses of classical modernism rest?

While Bourriaud identifies the shift in recent art as the desire to mobilise new localities of production, which he perceives today as proper to the field of artistic practice, a related field of historical research (as I have noted several times) has been examining the dimension of the off-centre principle of art-historical discourse for some time. The result of these research projects is slowly entering mainstream art-historical production. In the last decade, several scholars have explored the structure of the heterochronical (think, for instance, of Chakrabarty's notion of the heterotemporal method of organising historical frames) conception of modern and contemporary art history.

One such project is a recent exhibition, Turns in Tropics: Artist-Curator, developed for the 7th Gwangju Biennale by the Manila-based Filipino art historian and curator Patrick Flores. In his exhibition project, he proposes an agenda of experimental and conceptualist practices from the late 1960s to early 1980s in Southeast Asia by four artists working in contexts in which the spirit of modernity was not only transforming the splintered identity of the nation, but rapid modernisation was also recalibrating the canons and languages of artistic practice.¹² Flores's emphasis of location represents a distinct cultural ecology, as it were, a habitation of modernity. His research explores not only the shifts in the language of artistic modernity – between the traditional and the experimental, from academic painting to conceptualism – it also interrogates the effects and receptions of modernity by these postcolonial artists in relation to their belonging to the nation.

In doing so, he directs attention to a text stencilled on a sculpture by the Malaysian artist Redza Piyadasa, which states that 'Artworks never exist in time, they have "entry points."¹³ In this text Piyadasa's sculpture declares the contingency of its own history. In fact, it historicises its own ambivalence towards canonical epistemology. What the stencilled text seems to be questioning is the idea of art as a universal sign that is a frozen historical datum. Instead, artworks are dynamic forces that seek out relations of discourse, map new topologies, and create multiple relations and pathways. Piyadasa's statement anticipates and echoes Bourriaud's own suggestion for altermodernist art, both in its claim for the trajectories of art, but also in the shifting historical and temporal dimension of the apprehension of such art.

While none of the four artists whose works were examined in the exhibition have appeared in standard, so-called mainstream surveys and accounts of experimental art and conceptualism of the late 1960s to the present, new off-centre historical research such as Flores's consistently drives us to the harbours of these archipelagos of modernity and contemporary art. The work of Ray Albano from the Philippines, Jim Supangkat from Indonesia, Piyadasa and the younger Thai artist, curator and art historian Apinan Poshyananda, have clear structural affinities with the work of their contemporaries practicing in the West. Yet their work – made with an awareness of, and in response to, specific historical conditions – shares similar objectives with the work of other postcolonial artists from different parts of the world, including those living and practicing in Europe.

These objectives would be familiar to emerging scholars such as Sunanda Sanyal, whose research focuses on modernism in Uganda;¹⁴ Elizabeth Harney, who has written extensively about negritude and modernism in Senegal;¹⁵ or the magisterial writing on modern and contemporary Indian art by the eminent critic Geeta Kapur.¹⁶ Art historian Gao Minglu has engaged equally rigorously with contemporary Chinese art, and with the same objective.¹⁷ In a similar vein of historical archaeology, the Princeton art historian Chika Okeke-Agulu has studied and written persuasively on the generative character of young modern Nigerian artists in the late 1950s during the period of decolonisation.¹⁸ But by no means am I suggesting that many of the artists examined in these various research studies are obscure in their own artistic contexts. Their artistic trajectories belong exactly in the heterotemporal frames of historical reflection and the chronicles of their art are part of the heterochronical criticism and curating that has been part of the discourse of twentieth- and twenty-first-century modernity. However, viewed with the lens of a univocal modernist history, one that is predicated on the primacy of centres of practice – what Bourriaud refers to as the 'continental "mainstream"' – can these practices be understood as forming more than an archipelago, and in fact exceed the altermodernist impulse? They certainly do expand the purely modernist notion of artistic competence. These issues are at the core of recent writings and research by the British-Ghanaian art historian and cultural critic Kobena Mercer, who explores the diverse off-centre contexts of late modernism and contemporary art in a series of anthologies focused on artistic practices and artists in Africa, Asia and Europe.¹⁹ Similar issues were mapped in the seminal 1989 exhibition, The Other Story, a project curated by the Pakistan-born British artist and critic, Rasheed Araeen at the Hayward Gallery, wherein he examined the contributions of hitherto unrecognised non-western modernist artists to European modernism.²⁰

These surveys and situations of off-centredness are emblematic of the large historical gaps which today, in the era of globalisation, need to be reconciled with dominant paradigms of artistic discourse. In seeking to historicise these contexts of production and practice, a dialogic system of evaluation is established. It resolutely veers away from the standard and received notions of modernity, especially in the hierarchical segmentations that have been the prevailing point of entry into its review of off-centre practices.

MODERNITY, POSTCOLONIALITY AND SOVEREIGN SUBJECTIVITY

WHATEVER THE ENTRY POINT for the altermodern artists, there remain some boundaries between the locations of contemporary artistic practice and the historical production of modern subjectivity. These boundaries are tied up with the unfinished nature of the project of modernity. Consequently, I want to examine in more detail some ideas of modernity that could be related to the way hierarchies operate in the recognition and historicisation of artists and their locations of practice. The course I will follow could be likened to navigating the different levels and segments of grand and petit modernity, albeit with degrees of separation designating stages of development, movements, breaks in cultural logics, ossification of epistemological models, and transitions to which we ascribe the norms of the modern world. One logic of modernity to which the altermodern responds is globalisation, a series of processes synonymous with the emergence of a worldwide system of capitalism. We could understand this modernity, in its teleological unfolding, as part of the current manifestation of globalisation as a force-field of winners, near winners and losers. (The losers being, obviously, those thoroughly subordinated and utterly disenfranchised by modernity's centuries-long progression from the worlds of indenture, slavery, imperialism and colonialism, to the aggressive, retributive wars of recent memory.)

This field of retributive conduct has at its disposal the overwhelming capacity to erase and deracinate subjectivities that inhabit the cultural localities of petit modernity. This makes the large claims ascribed to grand modernity less an avatar of enlightened cultural and material transformation, and more a structure with a dark core. It seems fairly impossible to think of modernity without linking it to concepts such as sovereignty, equality and liberty as they have been developed across domains of life and social practices. Pace Michel Foucault's theory of biopower,²¹ a range of thinkers have focused on this dimension of modernity, a space in which the master and slave dialectic is writ large. This dialectic, developed by Hegel, dissociates sovereignty from the practice of self-governance, and instead embeds it in the interrogation of the relations between power and subordination.

However, subordination is directly linked to how power exposes the subordinated to structures of violence, to acts of historical erasure. In this area of analysis, Giorgio Agamben's extension of biopower and biopolitics was an attempt to sketch out the conditions around which what he calls naked life is summoned: a state of living in which individual sovereignty is exposed to its most basic, barest dimension, to execution.²² In terms of ideas surrounding modernity and colonialism, this thinking has been singularly illuminating, and has been taken up by other thinkers. The feminist literary scholar Judith Butler, for example, in a recent reflection on the prosecution of the war on terror and the hopelessness of prisoners caught in its principal non-place, Guantanamo Bay, addressed the issue of naked life in the essay 'Precarious Life.'²³

Pushing further the frontier of this thinking is the powerful writing of theorist Achille Mbembe, especially in an essay in which he summarises the dimensions of biopower, bare and precarious life as the zone of necropolitics. In the essay Mbembe explored the fundamental relationship between modernity and violence, particularly in the apparatuses of the colonial regime, such that 'To exercise sovereignty is to exercise control over mortality and to define life as the deployment and manifestation of power.'²⁴ For Mbembe, necropolitics is the condition under which conducts related to sovereignty – as he amply demonstrates by citing the policy of apartheid in South Africa or the predicament of the Palestinians in the occupied territories – are inextricably bound up with exercises of control over existence, of individual lives and their narratives. Most examinations of the artistic work coming out of South Africa during the apartheid era confirms how artists were overwhelmingly preoccupied with the structures of violence and its direct manifestation as part of the condition of colonial modernity and thereby establishes art as one exploration of the question of sovereignty. Here, resistance to violence and the rigorous assertion of sovereign subjectivity becomes in itself the subject and narrative of art and cultural production.

Facing away from culture, Mbembe in his critique, for example, sees political theory as tending to associate sovereignty with issues of autonomy, be it that of the state or of the individual. He argues however, that

The romance of sovereignty, in this case, rests on the belief that the subject is the master and the controlling author of his or her own meaning. Sovereignty is therefore defined as a twofold process of self-institution and self-limitation (fixing one's own limits for oneself). The exercise of sovereignty, in turn, consists in society's capacity for self-creation through recourse to institutions inspired by specific social and imaginary significations.²⁵

To distinguish this relation of self-institution and self-limitation, the central concern he notes targets instead 'those figures of sovereignty whose central project is not the struggle for autonomy but the generalised instrumentalisation of human existence and the material destruction of human bodies and populations.'²⁶ Two of Mbembe's historical examples are South Africa and Palestine. In the fate of these two spaces, he identifies the fundamental rationality of modernity, arguing, 'that modernity was at the origin of multiple concepts of sovereignty – and therefore of the biopolitical.'²⁷ Artworks such as those by William Kentridge, in films such as Ubu Tells the Truth 1997, and Paul Stopforth, in his 1980 drawing series Death of Steve Biko, to name only two instances from South Africa; and by Emily Jacir in her exhibition Where We